ON THE MEANING OF THE NAMES ASÓKA AND PIYADASI

There was a time in the history of Indian studies when some scholars were inclined to believe that the names Asóka and Piyadasi had belonged to two different men: Asóka (Asoka) was a king of Magadha from the Maurya dynasty, mentioned in some Buddhist and Hindu literary sources, while Piyadasi was the king whose famous inscriptions, or edicts, were discovered one by one in the first decades of the 19th century in different parts of India. The identity of the two kings was established in 1837, when the academic world became acquainted with the text of the Buddhist chronicle *Dípavamísa*¹. In this Páli text the names Asoka (or Asokadhamma, Dhammásoka) and Piyadasi (or Piyadassana) refer to the same king, renowned for his support of the Buddhist faith (cf. Dípavamísa VI. 1, 2,12-15,18,23-24; VII. 14-16,18; XV. 88; XVI. 5; Dípavamísa 1879: 146-193)². At a somewhat later period scholars

² Several decades later the identity of Asóka and Piyadasi was supported by additional evidence: the memorial columns in Lumbini and Nigliwa had been erected, according to the accounts of Chinese pilgrims Fa Hsian and Hsiueng Tsiang, by emperor Asóka, but archaeologists discovered on them inscriptions which attributed their erection to king Piyadasi: V. SMITH, "The Identity of were able to link the epigraphic and the literary evidence with certain historical dates (known from the Greek sources), namely those of Alexander the Great's Indian campaign and of Asoka's grandfather, Chandragupta's ascent to throne. Thus, a corner-stone has been laid upon which the entire structure of Ancient Indian history and chronology was to be set up.

More than a century and a half has passed since Asoka's identity with Piyadasi was established, yet we cannot claim that we know either the exact meanings of the names or the nature of their interrelationship. The present article is an attempt to answer these questions after a review of the earlier attempts to explain the meanings of the names, made by some ancient authors as well as by modern scholars.

As regards the name Asoka (Asoka) there are various interpretations of its meaning in the Buddhist literary sources, yet most interpretations lack reliability and are often contradictory. According to one of the versions, Asoka (Aśoka) was the king's nickname, meaning "one-who-has-no-sorrow (for people)", "one-who-has-no-mercy", "merciless"; he is said to have been given the nickname because in his younger days he had done plenty of cruel acts in the struggle with his relatives for the throne of Magadha³. But the most reliable historical sources, his inscriptions, do not mention Asoka's struggle for power. Also, there is evidence that the king himself considered the name Asoka to be his personal name and not a nickname with a derogatory meaning. Moreover there are grounds to believe that the cruelty of the young emperor was grossly exaggerated by the Buddhists: in their legends they made use of various means to emphasize the contrast between the cruelty of the king before his conversion to Buddhism and his kindliness afterwards⁴.

Some modern scholars tend to give the name an alternative interpretation: A-śoka, according to them, stands for “One-who-knows-no-sorrow”, i.e., “One-who-is-calm” or “tranquil”, “One-who-achieved-tranquillity”, and thus has a positive meaning. They suggest that it was an official, “throne” name of the Emperor, which had a Buddhist meaning, i.e., the meaning related to the fundamental principles of Buddhism⁵. This explanation is not convincing for merely one reason: if it was indeed a royal, “throne” name and a Buddhist one, why, then, did the Emperor almost never (with only a few exceptions) use it in his official royal edicts or in his inscriptions addressed to the Buddhist saṅgha?

In several Buddhist legends the name Aśoka is interpreted to mean “having (or: bringing)-no-sorrows”: from the moment the child was born his mother considered herself to be “sorrowless” or “free from sorrow”, because the birth of a son considerably strengthened her position at court⁶. According to another version (in a commentary to the Mahāvamisa - Vanisatthappakāśinī 6. 125), the child was named Aśoka as “bringing-no-sorrow” to his mother, because her labour had been painless.

Most interpretations of the name Aśoka in the Buddhist sources should be approached with caution; they are merely instances of the so-called “etymological reinterpretation” - when at first an author finds a fictitious etymology for a certain name, which serves him as a pretext to invent a story about the name’s bearer that would fit in well with his character. Such an “etymological reinterpretation” was an element of poetry or an element of narrative technique, and neither the writer nor his readers would consider it literally or historically true. This may explain why, in one and the same Buddhist text (e.g., in the Aśokāvadāna) different and even contradictory “explanations” of the name Aśoka are found side by side. The readers would never regard it as odd or unnatural, because they were obviously quite familiar with this poetic convention.

However, among Buddhist legends about the great Emperor there are a few which probably reflect historical truth as far as the meaning of the name is concerned. In these legends the name Asoka is perceived as a "tree-name", i.e., the name given to a person after a particular tree; in our case it is the asoka-tree (Saraca Indica). There is a story, in the Asokāvadāna, about the cruel young Asoka who ordered to execute some maids at his court because they had picked the flowers and had broken the branches of the asoka-tree growing in the palace garden. The king felt insulted because the tree was "of one name" with him (sahānāma). There is a similar story in the Asokāvadāna and in the earlier Sūtrālamikāra by Aśvaghoṣa: in it, the old Emperor, deprived of all his riches and of his royal power by the greedy relatives, likens himself, in his lamentation, to a cut-down asoka-tree, devoid of leaves and flowers.

But was it possible for a prince and a member of the Magadhan royal family to be named after a tree? Such a possibility does not seem unlikely - in view, e.g., of the fact that in some Buddhist biographies of Asoka an important role is ascribed to his young nephew, Nigrodha (Sanskrit Nyagrodha, i.e. vāṭa, or the famous Indian banyan-tree, Ficus Indica). Thus, according to this legend, tree-names were not uncommon in the Maurya royal family. True, the name Nigrodha could have been invented by the Buddhists following the pattern of the name Asoka, but in this case it can be assumed that the Buddhists evidently perceived the name Asoka as a tree-name.

Outside the Buddhist tradition, in a Hindu, Purāṇic text additional evidence is found to indicate that the meaning of the Emperor's name was somehow connected with the asoka-tree: the name of the Magadhan king is used in it in the form Asokavardhana which can be understood in two ways: "One-who-increases-sorrowlessness-(of his subjects)"⁷ or "One-who-plants-the-asoka-trees". Planting of trees, especially of sacred ones, is known to have been a duty of a king in Ancient India. Tree-worship was particularly popular in East India under the first Mauryas (Ásoka's predecessors), the only notable difference between them and Ásoka being that, as a devout Buddhist, he had a special reverence for the bodhi-tree (asvattha, pippal)⁸. Ásoka was clearly not an ordinary tree, but a sacred one, which played an important role both in myth and in ritual. Special importance is ascribed to the ásoka-tree in the Jaina religion; the central position of Ásoka in Jainism⁹ may be compared to that of the bodhi tree in Buddhism. We must also bear in mind that, according to the Jaina sources, some Maurya emperors, beginning with Ásoka's grandfather, the great Chandragupta, were ardent followers of the Jaina religion¹⁰. It seems possible that in the early Buddhism too, the ásoka-tree could have played a significant role - in any case, modern Hinayāna Buddhists in Burma worship Ásoka as the tree under which the Buddha was born and, at a later time, preached his first sermon¹¹. But particularly important was the role played by the ásoka-tree in the Ancient Indian folk tradition, namely, in the specific rites performed by young maidens, which will be discussed below.

Let us now turn to the Emperor's other name: Piyadasi. To the best of my knowledge, ancient authors never explained its meaning: it was, from their point of view, self-evident and did not require an explanation. But as far as modern scholars are concerned, there are two opposite ways to understand the meaning of Piyadasi. A majority of scholars interpret and translate the name as "One-who-looks-with-kindness-(upon his subjects)" or "One-who-looks-with-friendliness-(at all people)", "One-who-looks-with-compassion- (at everybody)", or, even, "Humane"¹². All these scholars believe that the last element (-darśin) in the name Priyadarśin has an active meaning (“one who looks at”, “looking upon”). This interpretation of the name (especially in the form “One-who-looks-with-kindness-upon-his-subjects”) fits in well with the Buddhist outlook of Asoka in his mature years, after his conversion and after the Kalinga war. But the inscription found in Taxila was made on behalf of the young prince Priyadarśin, and it testifies to the fact that he had borne the name long before his conversion to Buddhism and even before he became a king¹³. It would be worth noticing that the Greek and the Aramaic inscriptions of Asoka do not translate this name but only attempt to reproduce it phonetically (Piodāsas, Prydrś); therefore one comes to the conclusion that the name was understood at the time not as an epithet having some special significance in the context of Dharma-preaching, but merely as a personal name. Here another problem arises as well - that of the appropriateness of a name with such a meaning in particular historical circumstances. It is known that Asoka-Piyadasi was a member of the royal dynasty that practised very active policy of military conquests, launched merciless wars, exterminated local ruling elites, etc. Was it appropriate for a son of such a warlike family to receive, at the moment of his birth, the name meaning “One-who-looks-at-all-people-with-compassion” or suchlike? It seems to me highly improbable. This is why we must pay particular attention to the alternative interpretation of the name Piyadasi (Priyadarśin).

Some scholars, though very few in number, translate the name Piyadasi (Priyadarśin) as “Pleasant-to-look-upon”, “Pleasant-to-behold” or “Pleasant-to-the-eyes”¹⁴. They believe that the last element (-darśin) in the compound name has a passive meaning: “seen”, “looked upon” etc. Indeed, -darśin at the end of compounds can have, in Sanskrit, either an active, or a passive meaning. But in case of Priyadarśin the passive meaning for -darśin is more likely. It would be useful to recall here that in the Buddhist literary sources, alongside with the form Piyadas(s)i (= Priyadarśin), two other forms of the name are used: Piyadassana (= Priyadarśana)¹⁵ and Piyadasa, Piyadassa (= Priyadarśa)¹⁶. The former, piyadassana, as a noun, in most cases has a passive meaning, while the latter, piyadas(s)a, has only one, passive meaning (“pleasant to be seen” etc.). But the fact remains that all the three forms - piyadas(s)i, piyadassana and piyadas(s)a - are synonymous (otherwise how could they have been used as the names of the same king?). Thus, it would only be logical to interpret the name Piyadasi in the passive sense (as “pleasant to behold”, “beautiful” etc.).

Now let us turn to the other problem: in what way are the two names of the Emperor, Aśoka and Piyadasi, interrelated? Most scholars are inclined to think that they differ chronologically, i.e., that they were used in different periods of the Emperor’s life. Many historians, for example, consider the name Aśoka to be a personal name of the king, the name which he received at birth, while Piyadasi was, in their opinion, his Buddhist name¹⁷ or his “royal”, “throne” name which was given to him at the ceremony of his coronation¹⁸. And there is, of course, an entirely opposite point of view, represented in the 1930-s by S. Mitra and, in 1960-s, by G.M. Bongard-Levin. These scholars believe that the personal name of the prince was Piyadasi, while Asoka was his “royal”, or “coronation”, name with a Buddhist meaning. Both scholars refer to the passage from a work by Buddhaghoṣa, which runs: «the prince named Piyadasi, having established his royal umbrella, became Dharmarājā Asoka»¹⁹. But the evidence cannot be accepted, since the Emperor almost never or very seldom, as has already been mentioned, used this supposedly “royal”, or “official” name in his official inscriptions. The passage from Buddhaghoṣa can prove only one thing, namely, that in the Buddhist tradition of the 5th century A.D. (eight hundred years following the events) the image of the legendary Dharmarājā was predominantly associated with the name Asoka.

Of a much greater historical importance to us is the evidence of Asoka’s own inscriptions. How did the Emperor name himself - or, how was he named - in these official documents?

In the overwhelming majority of the inscriptions a standard anthroponimic formula is used:

devānanipiya Piyadasi rājā
“dear to the gods king Piyadasi” - (137 cases)²⁰

Sometimes the formula is used in a reduced, elliptic form:

devānami piya - (20 cases)
rājā Piyadasi - (4 cases)

²⁰ According to M.C. Joshi, J. C. Joshi, op. cit., p. 418, I regard devānampiya “dear to the gods” not as a name, but as a title, which was applied to kings before and after Asoka: V. SMITH, “The Authorship of the Piyadasi Inscriptions”, in JRAS, 1908 (1st half), pp. 504-505. At a later time the word acquired the meaning “fool”, which puzzled many Indologists (see, e.g., B. PRAKASH, “Historical Study of the Sanskrit Word Devānampriya”, in Vishveshvaranand Indological Journal, 8, pt. 1-2, (March-Sept. 1970), pp. 160-171); probably, one has to take into account a possibility, in this case, of the universally spread semantic shift: “chosen by the gods” - “(holy) madman” - “fool”.

As regards the name Aśoka, it appears in the inscriptions only a few times. In one instance it evidently substitutes the name Piyadasi in the standard anthroponomic formula:

devā nam piya Asoka

(Maski, MRE I).

For years it had remained a single instance of this kind, until, about 20 years ago, a version of Minor Rock Edict I (MRE I) was discovered in Nittur (Karnataka), containing the name Asoka (though not in the first, but in the last sentence). A version of the MRE II was also found in Nittur, containing the name Aśoka in the first sentence, in the way similar with the Maski version of MRE I. Once more this name (in combination: rājā Aśoka devānampiya) appears in another version of MRI from Udegoļam²¹.

But there is only one inscription in which both names - *Asoka*²² and Piyadasi - stand side by side: the version of MRE I from Gujarat:

devānampiya Piyadasi Asoka rājā

It must be emphasized that all the inscriptions containing the name Asoka are versions of Minor Rock Edicts I and II which should be regarded as the Emperor's earliest edicts²². These inscriptions witness with all certainty that there are no grounds whatsoever to attribute the names Aśoka and Piyadasi to different periods in the Emperor's life: according to the data of Minor Rock Edicts I and II these names were used simultaneously. This evidence also rules out the possibility that Aśoka and Piyadasi were "parallel" names, i.e., names, used in different spheres of life (as, for example, in modern life - the personal name of an author and his/her pen name, or, as in our case, the personal name and the royal, or Buddhist, religious name): the earliest edicts of Asoka witness that not only the name Piyadasi, but also the name Asoka was used (though very seldom) in official royal inscriptions. Thus, we can conclude that neither of the popular explanations of the interrelation between the names Asoka and Piyadasi (as belonging to different periods of time, or as belonging to different spheres of the Emperor's life) is convincing. The interrelation between the names should be explained in some other way.

²¹ D.C. SIRCAR, "Recently discovered Minor Rock Edicts of Aśoka", in JAIH, Calcutta, 9, 1977-1978 (1979), pp. 6-12; D.C. I am grateful to Professor Bratindra Nath Mukherjee for his helpful suggestion to take into account these works by the late Prof. D.C.Sircar.

There is a peculiarity in the usage of the two names which gains special importance in this respect. The names Asoka and Piyadasi are almost never used together, in one formula. This is relevant for the literary (Hindu and Buddhist) sources and for the inscriptions as such. The Gujara inscription (devānampiya Piyadasi Asoka rājā) seems to be the only exception from the general rule; the rule being that each time only one name is used: either Asoka, or Piyadasi. This peculiarity did not escape the attention of the eminent historian Vincent Smith who defined, in one of his articles, the names Asoka and Piyadasi as convertible names²³. It was only a guess, made in passing, yet a lucky one, which merits further exploration. The aim of the present article is to show that Asoka and Piyadasi are, indeed, convertible names, and, also, to explain the nature of their convertibility.

It may seem strange to refer to Sanskrit Epic poetry for evidence to elucidate the meanings of the names in the inscriptions of the Maurya period²⁴, but the key-verse to support my arguments is contained, as it seems, in the well-known Nalopākhyāna (story of Nāla and Damayantī) from the third book of the Mahābhārata, Āraṇyakaparvan. Abandoned by her husband, suffering from separation, Damayantī sights an asoka-tree, standing amidst the forest and addresses it, asking the tree to let her see her husband. Her address contains the following words:

²³ V. SMITH, "The Identity of Piyadasi (Priyadarśin) with Asoka Maurya and Some Connected Problems",... p. 829.

²⁴ It could be argued that it is practically impossible to ascribe with any certainty any passage of the Indian Epic to any particular historical epoch. How, then, can we use epic verses for the reconstruction of linguistic and cultural phenomena of the Maurya period? The answer is: the only way to date an epic passage is to differentiate between the later style of written literature - and the free, formulaic, but at the same time widely variative style of oral epic poetry. The verses that I use in support of my point of view are full of formulas which are still elastic and variative, in contrast to some petrified clichés of the late parts of the Epic.

viśokām kuru mām kṣipram aśoka priyadarśana

which literally means: "Quickly make me the one-without-sorrow, oh asoka, pleasant-to-look-upon..."

The Nalopākhyāna is extensively used (at least, in Europe) for training students in Sanskrit. There is no doubt that hundreds of scholars and students, upon reading this verse, wondered if it could be a pure chance that the tree-name, identical with the name of the Magadhan emperor, is defined here by the adjective which is identical to the other name of the same person? Indeed, the epithet priyadarśana can be applied in the Mahābhārata to different objects and personages (e.g., to Bhimasena - III.157. 47; 176.15; to warriors from Udra and Pāṇḍya countries - VIII. 8.15; to king Duryodhana - III. 231. 11; VIII. 25. 4²⁵).

Yet I think it would be preposterous to agree with this common opinion and to regard the combination of words asoka priyadarśana in Mbh III. 61. 99 as a pure coincidence. There are several relevant passages in the Mahābhārata and the Rāmāyaṇa that convince me

Therefore we may assume that they belong to the earlier stratum of stylistic means in the Epic, which constituted the heritage of the oral epic tradition. There can be no doubt that the Sanskrit epic tradition existed in the Maurya period in its oral form. Numerous correspondences between the Sanskrit epic verses and the Buddhist gāthās convince us that both traditions used some common treasury of poetic formulas and imagery.

that priyadarśana was not merely one among many adjectives which was applied to the noun asoka only once and more or less incidentally, but that priyadarśana was a constant epithet for the noun asoka in the language of Sanskrit Epic poetry.

The same episode of Damayantī's address to the asoka tree contains the following verse:

*yathā viśokā gaccheyam asókanaga tat kuru /
satyanāmā bhavā 'soka mama śokavināśanat //*

(Mbh III. 61. 102)

“Oh asoka-tree, make so that I may become the one-without-sorrow; be true to your name, oh asoka, by way of destroying my sorrow”.

Here the second line deserves special attention. Damayantī asks the asoka tree to be true to its name by way of destroying her sorrow (śokavināśanat). But the pun, or the wordplay, is not as simple as it seems. The pun in this śloka is double. On the one hand, Damayantī asks the tree to be true to its name (asoka) by way of making her a “one-without-sorrow” (viśokā). But on the other, she asks the tree to make true its other name, or, to be precise, by way of removing sorrow (śokavināśanāt) to make true its constant epithet śokanāśana. The instances when śokanāśana serves as a constant epithet for the asoka-tree can be found not only in the Mahābhārata, but also in another great Sanskrit epic poem, Rāmāyaṇa (e.g., Rām. V. 15. 7: asokaiḥ bokanāśanaiḥ).

Now let us compare the verse Mbh. III.61.102 with a verse from the Rāmāyaṇa. The latter verse is used in the following episode: Rāma, in his search for Sītā, sees an asoka-tree standing in the middle of the forest and asks it to let him see his beloved again:

*asoka śokāpanuda śokopahata cetanam /
tvam nāmānam kuru kṣipram priyāsamidarśanena mām //*

(Rām. III. 60. 17)

“Oh aśoka-tree, the one-who-drives-sorrows-away, quickly make me, whose-mind-is-afflicted-with-sorrow, (like) your name - by way of seeing-my-beloved (or: by way of making-me-see-my-beloved)’.

There can be no doubt that the second line of this verse follows the same pattern as the second line of the previously cited verse Mbh. III. 61. 102 (the similarity is even more complete if we take into account the variant of the verse Rām. III.60.17, found in the Southern Recension of the Mahābhārata; see Critical edition, Āraṇyakaparvan, *280: tvami nāmānami kuru kṣiprami priyāsamidar- sanād dhi mām). The obvious analogy between Mbh. III.61.102 and Rām. III.60.17 gives us grounds to believe that in the case of the Rāmāyaṇa verse there is, again, a double pun: not only does Rāma ask the aśoka-tree to make him “resemble its name” - i.e., to make him a-śoka or vi-śoka “the-one-without-sorrow”, but at the same time he implies that aśoka-tree must actualize its other name: priyadarśana by letting him see his beloved (priyāsamidarśanena, priyāsamidarśanat), or, perhaps, even by making him a priyādarśana in the sense of the bahuvīhī compound: the one-who-sees-his-beloved (or: the one-who-had-darśana-of his-beloved).

In the article published in Russian several years ago I came to the conclusion, on the basis of only these three epic ślokas, that the word priyadarśana in the language of the Sanskrit Epic poetry most probably served as a constant epithet for the noun aśoka, i.e., that the epithet priyadarśana was regularly and repeatedly used in reference to this tree. All my attempts to find some additional textual material failed. It was evident that the usage of the formulas referring to aśoka priyadarśana is limited to a particular conventional literary situation: a lover, separated from his/her partner, addresses an aśoka-tree, asking it to make him/her see the beloved again. I expressed hope at the time that some other scholars would probably find the descriptions of a similar situation outside the Epic, in some other genres of Sanskrit (or Pali, Prakrit) literature. As regards the Sanskrit Epic, I was sure that there were no more relevant contexts²⁶. Now I must admit that I was mistaken.

During my stay in Calcutta as a visiting fellow of the Asiatic Society in the spring-summer 1995 I had an opportunity to use a rare Indian edition that Russian libraries do not possess - the pāda-index to the *Mahābhārata*²⁷ in which one can find any epic śloka and any particular formula contained not only in the Critical text, but also in all the manuscript versions that the compilers of the Critical edition used. With the help of this index it was very easy to find, in one of the Appendices to the Critical edition, a passage where the same formulaic śloka as in Rām. III. 60. 17, was used in the Mahābhārata in an extremely interesting context. The passage, as it seems, removes all the remaining doubts and provides answers to two very important questions: why was the asoka-tree called priyadarśana, and, why in all the passages cited do lovers, separated from objects of their love, address this particular tree and ask it to let them see the beloved again?

In the first book of the Mahābhārata, Ādiparvan, a story is told (Mbh. I.77) about Yayāti, the king who married a beautiful Brahman girl, daughter of ṛṣi Śukra, Devayānī. Yayāti took Devayānī from the forest hermitage of her father to his capital. She was followed by her many maid-servants; among them there was Śarmiṣṭhā, daughter of the Asura king Vṛṣaparvan. Many years earlier Śarmiṣṭhā had gravely insulted Devayānī and her father, the great ṛṣi Śukra; in punishment for it she was ordered by her own father to wait upon Devayānī as a maid-servant and to follow her to the house of her would-be husband. So, Yayāti took both Devayānī and Śarmiṣṭhā to his capital; he installed Devayānī, as the queen, in his antahpuram, the inner, ladies', chamber of his palace; while Śarmiṣṭhā was established in a small mansion, especially built for this purpose in the royal garden, close to the aśoka-grove (aśokavanikā). In due course, queen Devayānī gave birth to a beautiful son. A little later, Śarmiṣṭhā, too, attained to puberty and saw that her season had come; yet she had no husband! And at this point of the narrative the Southern Recension inserts, or I would rather say, preserves a passage, full of precious, fascinating details: having bathed and purified herself, Śarmiṣṭhā, decorated with all her ornaments, went to the aśoka-grove, came up to an aśoka-tree, took a branch covered with bright flowers in one hand, took a mirror in the other and, looking into the mirror with the desire to see her future husband there (bhartṛdarśanalāsa), pronounced the words:

aśoka śokāpanuda śokopahatacetasam /
tvami nāmānām kuru kṣiprami priyasanidarśanād dhi mām //

(Mbh., Crit. ed., Ādi-parvan, *794; cf. text and translation of Rām. III. 60. 17 above).

The action described in this passage is undoubtedly a folk rite, namely, a young maiden's puberty rite, with some elements of fortune-telling²⁸. The description makes it perfectly clear that the ²⁸ One has to distinguish between folk puberty rites of this kind and the later custom of udyānakrīḍā - "garden-games" of court ladies. Although udyānakrīḍā can possibly be traced, in its origin, to folk puberty rites, it lost any connection with the age group of girls who have attained puberty and become a pastime of all ladies at royal court. The udyānakrīḍā included actions with various trees: ladies spat wine on the roots of the bakula tree or rubbed their breasts against the trunk of the kurabaka tree. "It was commonly believed that the tree of Aśoka does not bloom and the hero (Nāyaka) fails to show his strong emotion for longing unless the two received the stroke (prahāra) of the left foot (vāmapāda)...of a charming lady under intoxication" (U.N. Roy, "Dohada" - a Folk-Custom of Ancient India", in History and Culture. Dr. B.P. Sinha Felicitation Volume, Ed. by BHAGWANT SAHAI. Delhi, 1987, p. 105). The obvious parallelism between the aśoka tree and a lover, Nāyaka (it is said sometimes that Aśoka and Nāyaka, with equal longing, wait for the stroke of a drunken lady's foot) gives some grounds to suggest that this act (defined in Classical literature by the term dohada) was not merely a game but could have originally, in common with other varieties of udyānakrīḍā, the meaning of a love-magic charm. But, in any case, the custom of udyānakrīḍā was a product of refined, aristocratic, perhaps even somewhat decadent culture of royal courts in the Late Antiquity and the Early Mediaeval period. Its earliest descriptions appear in classical plays of Kālidāsa. In the Vākramorvaśiyam, Act IV, verse 62, Purūravas, ásoka-tree was called priyadarśana not only because of the beauty of its flowers (in India there are many trees and plants with beautiful flowers, and at least one of them, like ásoka, had the word priyadarśana as their second name²⁹). The words ásoka priyadarśana contained a double pun and had a second meaning. The ásoka-tree was called priyadarśana because it was believed that the tree could give a maiden a darsana (an opportunity to see) of her priya (i.e., predestined husband), the tree could allow the girl to see, in a special magic rite, the face of her would-be beloved. It is clear now, why in all the above-cited passages from the Sanskrit epic poetry the lover, separated from the object of his love, addresses none other than the ásoka-tree, with a request to let her/him see the beloved again. The answer is simple: because the ásoka-tree, according to the widely spread folk belief, had a special magic power to do so.

Provided with this stimulating evidence, we can be almost absolutely sure that the word priyadarśana in the language of the Sanskrit epic poetry served as the constant epithet of the ásoka-tree; then, after having been substantiated, was turned into a noun, synonymous of the name of the tree. In fact, the word priyadarśana in the language of Ancient Indian folklore was merely another name of the ásoka-tree.

What consequences does this have to our historical problem of the meaning of the Emperor's names? The newly-gained knowledge looking for Urvāśī, "says to the full-blossomed ásoka tree that shaking by its sides with the force of the wind, it was acknowledging its ignorance about his darling Urvāśī. But if it was a fact, then how it was glowing with full-grown lovely flowers, whose petals were being bitten by black bees, without receiving her foot-stroke?" (U.N. ROY, op. cit., p. 107). It is evident that Kālidāsa tried to explain in this verse the old traditional situation (a lover in separation addresses an ásoka-tree) in the light of the later belief, connected with the custom of dohada. In the earlier, epic description of the same situation there is no trace of this later belief, the only reason for a lover to address the tree being its supposed ability to make the object of love visible.

²⁹ According to dictionaries, in Classical Sanskrit the noun priyadarśana was used as the name of the tree ksīrika "Terminalia tomentosa, Mimusops Kauki L." (RĀJĀ RĀDHĀKANTA DEVA, Śabdakalpadrumah. Trītyāḥ khāndah, Delhi, 1987, p. 368; O. BÖHTLINGK, R. ROTH, Sanskrit-Wörterbuch, IV Theil, Delhi, 1990, p. 1164.

enables us to see the complete picture now perfectly clear. The prince, born in the Maurya family, was named after the asoka-tree - not only a beautiful, but also a sacred tree, very popular in Ancient Indian folklore and religion. From the very beginning he was also called by the synonymous name, Piyadassana (with the forms Piyadassa and Piyadasi, identical in meaning). This initial state of affairs is reflected most adequately in the Buddhist historical chronicles where the names are used simultaneously. The same situation is evidenced by the earliest edicts of Aśoka, namely, by the data of MRE I and II, where (in some versions) both names are used. But later, in the subsequent period of Aśoka's rule, the compilers of inscriptions show evident preference for only one name: Piyadasi. The reasons for it are obvious. In contrast to the name Aśoka and such synonymous forms as Piyadas(s)a, the name Piyadasi could be easily read and interpreted not as a "tree-name" (with the primary meaning "pleasant to behold"), but in another sense, in the active meaning: "One-who-looks-with-kindness (compassion)-upon-his-subjects (upon all people)". Such a reading of the name was in perfect accord with the image of a kind and pious ruler, the image that either the compilers of the edicts or the royal author himself wanted and strove to create.
